You are just one click away from the key!Q: Class hierarchy design - where to put interfaces? I have a service that I need to read a lot of data from. It contains (currently) around 40-50 methods that read data and provide the result. I need to refactor this into a class hierarchy. I have two options. Option A I introduce an interface for each method and put it in each class. Here's an example. public interface IColumnsService { int ColumnCount { get; set; } byte[] ColumnName { get; set; } byte[] ColumnValue { get; set; } string[] ColumnUserName { get; set; } string[] ColumnPassword { get; set; } List Data { get; } } public class DataSet { List Records { get; set; } } public class DatabaseRecord { string UserName { get; set; } string Password { get; set; } } public class UsersService : IColumnsService { public UsersService(ILogFactory logFactory, IUserFactory userFactory, IUserProfileFactory userProfileFactory, INumCallbackFactory

numCallbackFactory, DataAccessManager dbAccessManager, IEnumerable loggers, IStartupService startupService, ExceptionManager exceptionManager) { _logger = logFactory;
    _logger2 = loggers.First(); _userFactory = userFactory;
    _userProfileFactory = userProfileFactory; _numCallbackFactory =
        numCallback
